Changing the Officer Promotion System to Support Unit Focused Stability (UFS). ,2005 The United States Army is currently implementing a new manning initiative called Unit Focused Stability (UFS). While UFS offers great potential for increased unit cohesion within Brigade Combat Teams, it creates significant friction within the current personnel management system. Officers will be challenged to meet the intent of UFS while also adhering to current professional development paths and strict promotion timelines. This monograph endeavors to answer the following research question: Will a change in the officer promotion system help to ensure the long-term success of UFS? This paper begins with an analysis of the UFS model and its impact on the officer corps. The examination identifies thirteen friction points for officers in the rank of lieutenant through colonel. Next, this study examines the officer promotion system to determine its underlying assumptions, their associated implementation principles, and the specific laws and policies that have stemmed from them. Finally, this monograph proposes three possible changes to the Army officer promotion system. The monograph concludes that Army must change its officer promotion system to ensure the longevity of UFS and the future health of the officer corps.

Bonn,1999 This is the definitive guide to what the Army expects from its officers in leadership, technical skills, and character, and what every officer, junior or experienced, needs to know to succeed in the Army of the 21st century. General and Flag Officer Careers Harry Thie, 2001 Congress has recently expressed concern that the current tenure system for developing general and flag officers does not effectively prepare them for handling increasing levels of responsibility and for performing with maximum efficiency at each level of assignment. This report assesses the continued appropriateness of mandatory retirement of general and flag officers after 35 years. It focuses on the value of extending tenure, specifically examining promotions, number of assignment, and career length. The study discusses two types of consequences resulting from such an extension. Systemic results of longer service lead to fewer promotions and fewer rising to the highest grades, but increased stability and experience. Career-path consequences indicate more depth or breadth of experience could result for officers. The appropriateness of continued mandatory retirement after 35 years depends, finally, on objectives. If the objective is rapid career-path movement to positions of responsibility, the 35-year limit accomplishes this. If the goal is more experienced officers and greater stability, removing the limit seems best. Decision makers will need to decide which objective is most important.
