But, since this book is written from my personal experiences, it also talks about the things that get us to that part of the journey. These ugly scars that make us and the journey of a depressed mind that still needs one to the light. These are the mental cages of life, specifically depression. Not only is it ore isolation but people are being pushed out with emotions and drugs and social media more and more and people need to see that it's okay to speak about these ugly parts of us. They still make us the beautiful people we are now and our depression and love and anxiety, at least, build in our heart about freedom through these cages of the mental fights that we have sometimes already experienced. It's divided into three chapters: freedon, revolution and the war. Freedom is a section of poems that journey outside from our hearts and highlighted the darkness in stuff work of us. In this book, the reader again an insistence to move in love and appreciation of oneself as much as our freedom against the societal ideal of love. Lastly, the war is composed of distorted poems written during the height of the sad period. They show the clear different mental states of a depressed person when in love, and a non-handing person when in love.
